NEW! RESILIENCY

Our Resiliency module is now available and recommended for middle and high school classrooms! In this new module, students will learn about different types of stress and how to build resilience through positive coping skills.

In the first activity, students watch a video that introduces them to the three types of stress and the resiliency scale. With the resiliency scale, students learn how negative experiences and positive supports can impact a person's capacity for resiliency. Using Maya's story, students will build a resilience scale, determining positive supports and trusted adults that helped Maya improve her resilience.

Then students read through scenarios and identify as a class if the coping strategy used was helpful, harmful, or useless. At the end, students are asked to fill out a worksheet to identify a stress in their life (toxic, tolerable, or positive). They will then identify positive coping skills and trusted adults to help them through this stress. Ultimately, students will build their resilience!
